If you've just updated to the Dev or Beta release of Google Chrome, you might have noticed that a special version of Adobe Flash is now integrated into the default distribution of Chrome. But what about your old plug-in? As it turns out, the old plug-in is generally still installed... but you can easily disable Chrome plug-ins in the latest version, so let's get to work. Disable the Extra Flash Plug-in Head over to about:plugins and look through the list—you should notice two Shockwave Flash plugins. The first one should be in your Google Chrome installation folder, and has the filename gcswf32.dll. This is the NEW one, so don't disable it! If you keep scrolling down, you'll see the old one, with the file name NPSWF32.dll. This is the OLD plugin, and you can safely disable it. Of course, if you only use Chrome you could just completely uninstall Adobe Flash from your system by heading into Control Panel's Uninstall Programs screen, and then finding and uninstalling Adobe Flash Player Plugin. The ActiveX version is for Internet Explorer. We've not done any testing to see if the old Flash plugin is even still active or not, but may as well disable it just to be sure, right? I didn't see this coming, but now that Google has announced that it's working with Adobe to integrate Adobe Flash into its Chrome browser, it makes perfect sense. To quote Google's Linus Upson, VP of Engineering: • When users download Chrome, they will also receive the latest version of Adobe Flash Player. There will be no need to install Flash Player separately. • Users will automatically receive updates related to Flash Player using Google Chrome's auto-update mechanism. This eliminates the need to manually download separate updates and reduces the security risk of using outdated versions. • With Adobe's help, we plan to further protect users by extending Chrome's "sandbox" to web pages with Flash content. I like this plan. I already like Chrome a lot anyway, and I see this as a real win for Chrome users. Some people are already crying about how could Google possibly support Chrome since HTML5's video tag will free of proprietary video codices, which just shows they haven't been paying attention. HTML5 doesn't magically solve the video question at all. It just puts it back on the Web browser designers. I'd like to see an open format become the video standard, but I'm not sure there is such a thing. Even Ogg Theora, the darling of open-source developers, has patent issues. In any case, like it or lump it, Adobe Flash has over 90% of the Web browser video market. Even on sites like YouTube and Vimeo, which also support HTML5's video tag, you'll find many videos won't play even with HTML5-compliant browsers. I know. I've tried. What's even more important though is that Adobe's PDF (Portable Document Format) and Flash have recently had one security hole after another pop up. By placing Flash within the Chrome security sandbox, however, even if things continue to go wrong with Flash, the effects will be limited. And, I must add, Chrome was the one browser that the recent Pwn2Own hackers weren't able to touch, and the sandbox was a big part of the reason why they were unable to breach it. Looking ahead, I can also see Google thinking about the advantage of having Flash built into its forthcoming Chrome operating system. I foresee that, in particular, Google will be very happy to have Flash on future Chrome OS-powered netbooks and tablets. I'm looking at you, Apple, with your iPad, which will not have Flash on it. For now, Chrome with built-in Flash is for developers only. Programmers and very brave end users can download the Chrome developer channel version with built-in Flash. To enable the built-in version of Flash, you'll need to run Chrome with the --enable-internal-flash command line flag. Copyright © 2010 IDG Communications, Inc. There will be no certified implementations of Adobe Systems' Flash Player for Android 4.1, and on August 15 the player will take a bow and no longer be available for download from Google's app store Play. Adobe said in blog post on Thursday. Adobe announced its plans to discontinue development of the Flash Player for mobile browsers last November, and is now revealing details of the timetable. There will be no certified version of Flash Player for Android 4.1, which was announced earlier this week at Google's I/O developer conference. The certification refers to the work Adobe does with smartphone and tablet vendors to ensure the software works correctly when preloaded on a device. Beginning on August 15, Adobe will also use the configuration settings in the Google Play Store to limit continued access to Flash Player updates to those devices that already have the player installed — but only for older versions of Google's operating system. Once a device has been upgraded to Android 4.1, Adobe wants users to remove Flash Player. That's because the company hasn't continued developing and testing the application for this new version of Android and its browser options. Still, users that today have a smartphone or tablet based on Android 4.0 or an older version of the operating system, and haven't installed the application are recommended to download it before Aug. 15. For developers, Adobe will instead concentrate on HTML5 and allowing them to package native apps with Adobe AIR for all the major app stores, it said.
