Moving your files from one computer to another is never easy, particularly if you're migrating from a PC to a Mac. Both platforms have directories where you're supposed to keep photos, music, documents and movies, but it's not as easy as simply copying and pasting your archives. While OS X won't automatically set up its applications once you've transferred your files over – a perk that Windows 10 offers – you will have your files properly organized. MORE: Best Apple Laptops Before you start, you'll need an external hard drive that works with both PCs and Macs. If you don't have such a drive already, we've got step-by-step directions for formatting a drive to work across both platforms. How to Move Your PC files to a Mac 1. Connect your external drive to your PC and select "Open folder to view files." 2. Click the New Folder icon. 3. Type "Exported Files" and hit Enter. 4. Click Quick access. 5. While holding Control, click on Desktop, Downloads, Documents, Pictures, Music and Videos. 6. Drag these folders to the external hard drive in the side menu, holding down on the mouse button until the menu reveals the Exported Files folder. 7. Move the cursor over Exported Files and release the mouse button. You'll have to wait anywhere from a few seconds to several minutes for the files to copy, depending on how much data you have. 8. Click the Up arrow in the System Tray. 9. Select the "Safely Remove Hardware and Eject Media" icon. 10. Select "Eject Mobile Drive" and wait for the Safe to Remove Hardware alert appears until you remove the hard drive. 11. Connect your external drive to your Mac and click on File in the Menu bar. 12. Select New Finder Window. 13. Select the Backup Drive from the side menu. 14. Double-click the Exported Files folder. 15. Double-click the Desktop folder. 16. Click Edit. 17. Click Select All. 18. Drag all of the files to Desktop in the sidebar. Repeat steps 16 through 19 as necessary, but moving Videos to Movies and Pictures to Photos. Your Mac now has all of your files! When you install Windows on one computer, it configures itself for the hardware. If you move the hard drive with that installation to another PC and boot from that, the OS suddenly finds itself in hardware it doesn't understand. It's as if you woke up one morning and found yourself in a strange house and had no idea why. But Windows isn't as smart as a human being. You would find the bathroom, but Windows would just take the same steps and turns it does every morning, and walk into a wall. Then there's the licensing issue. Windows is copy-protected. It won't work on hardware too different from what it was installed on. If you have a retail version of XP, that won't be too much of a problem. You call a Microsoft 800 number, explain your situation, and they'll fix it for you. But if XP came pre-installed on the old PC, that's the only PC that copy can run on. Besides, what would you do with the old computer? It's worth a lot less without a hard drive or an operating system. True, you can set it up with Linux and not buy an OS, but you'd still need a hard drive. You're better off buying a new hard drive and Windows 7—or buying a PC with them included. Just make sure you migrate your data files to the new PC and properly remove them from the old one before you get rid of it. Read the original forum discussion. Laptop, desktop or tablet, the choice is bewildering With the rush to adopt tablet PCs, the desktop and notebook computer can often be overlooked. However, with prices at an all-time low, and features now being included in PC desktop machines that have in the past been out of reach for many users, now is the time to upgrade to a new desktop or notebook PC. If you already have a number of desktop and notebook machines running Windows XP or even older operating systems, moving to a new PC is also highly recommended. Many businesses will have aging hardware that can no longer cope with the demands placed upon it. As small businesses need to look closely at the cost of moving to new equipment, buying new hardware is a considered purchase. However, when migration to Windows 7 or 8 is required, the purchase of new PCs that come pre-installed with the latest version of Windows can be a cost effective way to complete a migration. Indeed, research by Dimensional carried out for Dell concluded that: "Upgrades from Windows XP to Windows 7 or 8 are typically done in one of two ways: purchasing new hardware or re-imaging existing hardware. The largest group (30%) reported only hardware upgrades." Future proofing any IT purchase can be difficult, but with Intel's Haswell (4th generation Core processor) offering extended battery life for notebook PCs, in particular, upgrading your business' machines to this processor is a sensible decision. If desktop PCs make up the vast majority of your installed computers, upgrading to the current Core processors is ideal, as your business will have efficiency gains, as well as the ability to use Windows 8 with ease. With BYOD (Bring Your Own Device) sweeping across the business landscape, many enterprises are also taking more control and issuing tablet PCs to their employees. Buying tablet PCs with the new Core processor will certainly offer a high level flexibility – especially when you consider how Microsoft's Surface Pro could fit into your business' overall day-to-day operations. Where once the upgrade path for desktop PCs was clear, today small business owners are faced with a plethora of options and form factors. Is this a good time to upgrade to new PCs? The amount of choice means a resounding yes to that question. Moving on For small businesses running mission critical systems, taking a look at their existing set up may conclude that aging hardware is forcing their upgrade. But the fact is the arrival of new processors, the ability to develop a hybrid approach to any PC environment that can contain desktop, notebook and tablet PCs all running the same Windows 8 operating system, offers a level of integration that has not been possible before. Consider how your business currently uses its installed PCs. Try not to be swept up in the tsunami that has been the tablet revolution, but consider your entire business' needs with its computing services. Today, with masses of processing power, cheap storage, a new operating system that can span all types of computing devices, small businesses should upgrade their PCs now and take advantage of a computing environment that can meet their enterprises every need.
