My dog growls at new puppy

Getting a new puppy is exciting - at least for the humans of the family. Sometimes the house dog does not think that the PUP is a welcome addition, however. Many people believe that adding a puppy to the family will be harmonious, and that their current dog will be a good "mom" or "daddy" dog. They are disappointed when it doesn't happen. Often, expectations are not realistic, but in most cases that members of the human family see instead of such expectations is completely normal. Know in advance what to expect can help families, and existing dogs, make the process to introduce a new puppy to the family as simple as possible. What to expect I had the unique experience of welcoming 15 puppies in our house over the past 12 years. As puppies for an organization of service dogs, on average my husband and I welcome a new puppy every year. The new Pup arrives when it's about 8 weeks. It's far from her children, mom and her surroundings familiar for the first time. We have three dogs (permanent family members) and each new addition of puppies taught us more about how adult dogs and integrated puppies. We are working on puppy # 15 and here's what I learned so far: none of my dogs has ever received a puppy with open arms (legs) all the dogs growl and snap and move away from the pup no dogs have ever injured a puppy Remarks are quite normal. Every new puppy had the same welcome, year after year, from my dogs. While the occasional dog will dilute to welcome a puppy at home, in my experience most of the dogs will not open the "Welcome Wagon" when a new Pup enters the family. Communication skills puppies are simply learning how to communicate with each other. Usually, puppies have only had experience by reading their own steps and mother. Their communication capacities are still developing and do not know the "road rules" when it comes to interacting with new and different dogs. German shepherd puppies playing. The puppies also have different game styles compared to adult dogs. When comparing the way the puppies play the way in which adult dogs play, the differences are vast. Dogs follow a prescribed set of rules. There is a certain way to welcome each other. There is a specific way to invite the game. There is a way to stop playing. There is a whole ways of manners that adult dogs sign up and makes their predictable and pleasant social interactions. There is a shared language between dogs, and adult dogs are flowing in that language. The puppies do not follow the rules that adult dogs depend on a good and solid communication of the doggie. The puppies don't even know that the rules exist! When littermate puppies play together, the only rule is: not to each other. I saw a bloody puppy skipped on his bed of bed to sleep with reckless abandonment. Upon awakening, that the littering are joyfully engaged with the jumper. With that kind of feedback, it's easy to understand why puppies don't understand that the world has rules. When a puppy arrives in a new home without another puppy with a view to play with, naturally it collects the next closest thing: the adult dog. The pup does what he did with his teammates "launches on the head of the sleeping dog." What a rude awakening, "says the dog's sleep! And the growl that comes from the adult dog is completely unexpected and surprising for the new one puppy. Occasionally, if the growl is not enough to discourage the puppy to relaunch himself on the sleepy dog, a full view of teeth together with the most guttural growl that you have ever heard the puppy to cease and desist. Listen to this according to the our Adults, puppies have really scarce social skills and have a lot to learn. Our adult dogs have been valuable teachers to the puppies we have hosted, and we are grateful to them. The first lesson the puppy learns is where the lines are drawn. There are not many things that our dogs teach the puppy: an adult dog communicates a puppy that has crossed the line. line. Jump on my head. Don't steal the toy I'm playing with not putting your face in my bowl when I'm eating. Don't walk on me. Don't bite your ears or tail. They don't sit on me. Do not bark in the face. Don't come closer. Until the behavior of adult dogs is appropriate (which do not connect with the puppy, for example), it's all right, and the puppy begins to learn the new rules of this new home. After about three weeks, a certain game between adults and the puppy begins, even if with two of our three dogs it takes for four or five weeks before choosing to play with the puppy. Set for success for a harmonious family, you want to set both the puppy and the dog for success. Supervision is essential. Because the puppy does not have the same set of social skills like the adult dog, they are around for all the interactions between the two. I want to be there to help guide the puppy towards appropriate social commitment and to keep peace for adult dogs. I also want my adult dogs to know that I stay there interferences for them; That they can count on me to keep the puppy to become too much of a hassle. The most supervise, the lower opportunities dogs must take, bark, or growl to the puppy. Too often, adult dogs at home are required to take whatever the puppy can serve out. Too often, adult dogs at home are required to take whatever the puppy can serve out. This is similar to waiting as a restaurant of a restaurant to accept the son of a stranger crawling below and climbing on their tables! These expectations set up the puppy of trouble. The puppy does not learn the vital social skills will need to orientate themselves in the doggy world where you live. It is also fair for dogs that live at home. Adult dogs can accept that for a short period of time, but then the behavior of the puppy reaches a point of no return. In such circumstances, the dog can strike more force than he would have had if he was allowed to tell the puppy to make him fall much earlier in the process. Crates, gates, and the pens I like to put both adult dogs or cage puppy, behind a gate, or in an exercise pen (X-Pen) for some tranquility. Imponent periods predictable separation, planned and consistent between the puppy and adult dogs goes a long way to a harmonious life together. The puppies tend to be persistent and energetic. They don't quickly and can torment an old dog for much more time than the dog would allow. With the creation of separation opportunities scheduled, both the puppy and the dog are always the pauses they need to each other. Street of escape "essential both for the dog and the puppy of having an escape route and a "safe house". I taught my dogs like moving away from an annoying puppy very early in our years of service-can-raising. I would like to scream "kennel" if my dogs were beginning to become annoyed by the puppy. They would run to their chest, I had put a frozen stuffed Kong interior, and I would like to close the door. Dogs could enjoy a special treatment and get rid of the discomfort. Very quickly, they started self-cracked when they had pretty puppy. Reinforcement that the self-cash decision almost every time with the delivery of a frozen stuffed Kong. Avoiding growth punishment are a form of communication. Because puppies have immature communication capacity, often losing more subtle signals your older dog programs, and the dog may need to grow up. Resist the temptation to correct your dog to growl. Growling can be what the puppy needs in order to recognize that the dog does not want If you are able to correct both the puppy or the dog, supervise more instead and use the speakers, doors, and pens, like the way to manage interactions between the two. Strengthening the behavior You like you can teach your dog tolerate the new puppy using the same training principles clicker you use to teach your dog to sit and lie down. If the dog ignores the puppy, instead of growl, reinforce such! such! It's better than the growth, right? Just like in the obedience class, after your dog reliably ignores rather than grating, he raises the bar and expects a little more from your dog. You could reinforce the next tolerance. Dies your dog does not grow up or get up and move if the puppy is already next to the adult dog. Reinforce it! Click and stretch to use the clicker can help a more older dog to understand what behavior you would like to see from him in relation to the new puppy. The use of the clicker can help a more old dog to understand what behavior you would like to see from him in relation to the new puppy. A healthy side effect of using the clicker to facilitate the transition is that the model creates a happy association with the new puppy for the existing dog. When the new puppy is around, the older dog will have the opportunity to earn clicks and sweets. Think about what behavior you would like to see from your dog that is not too difficult to realize. Using the example above, doing something different from growling to a puppy could be good behavior to click and treat. Remember that your responsibility for the existing dog is to keep the puppy far enough that it cannot annoy the existing dog. It is up to you to make sure that the existing dog is able to click and treat yourself easily, then make sure you use Tetherber, speakers and gates to help your dog earn a click. Continue to click and cure the appropriate behavior from the existing dog until he tolerate the antics of the appropriate puppies. While the older dog becomes more comfortable with the puppy and tolerates the interaction of the appropriate puppy, the criteria often change. Click on the existing dog to make the decision to apologize from the situation voluntarily. I would have much rather than my dog simply moves away from an exuberant puppy than the behavior of him to match the puppy. I will not put the existing dog in a position where it resists its natural nature "Doggie Nature" to withstand the unpleasant puppy interactions only to earn a click and treat. Make sure that the existing dog is enjoying the interaction and is patient and tolerant because it is beginning to enjoy the interaction with the puppy, and not simply stand it for the training sake. Using the clicker to strengthen the appropriate behavior, together with limiting the access of the existing dog, translates into a setting for both success. Manage the situation and provide a trained clicker guide on what is appropriate ... for the puppy and the existing dog. Danger signs not all dogs like puppies. Some dogs do not tolerate puppies at all and can have over-the-top reactions that could damage the puppy. It is important to keep a watchful eye on the interactions, and intervene when the body language and communication intensity at an unsafe level. Happy together if the YIP or scream puppies during the escalation process, and your dog increases even more, surely it intervenes. Dogs well paid in the dog-dog communication understand that the YIP or the scream is the equivalent of the puppy crying "uncle!" And it should come back out of the puppy. If you see the opposite - the cries of "uncle" lead to greater agitation in your dog ... separates the two immediately. A big family (happy) after what seems like an eternity but it's really only about three weeks, you will start to notice some signs of harmony between the dog and the puppy. If you did your part, helping the dog and the puppy develop their communication abilities, this is the beginning of a fabulous friendship ... or at least a peaceful coexistence. Not all dogs love them, so don't be disappointed if your dog does not fall each fell in love with the Dog at home. There is enough love for both, that comfortable coexistence is a good result. Realization. Realization.
